In the past, it was possible to access AutoCAD using IBM's Visual LISP, which integrates with the application. The main use of the AutoLISP language was for macros that are embedded in drawing files. AutoCAD users often wrote macros to make the application work as they wished, but now the only use of AutoLISP is for developing AutoCAD applications, creating add-on applications and writing custom solutions. Visual LISP Alfonso Manzanero and Cecilia Manzano created Visual LISP in the late 1980s to port AutoLISP to the PC. It provides a number of advanced features for developers, including: dynamic memory management, the ability to edit files on disk, text processing, and more. AutoCAD for Visual LISP provides the basic drawing tools. It can handle more than 17 million polygons, objects, and views at once. Windows Application Programming Interface AutoCAD also has a Windows API. It uses a proprietary technology called ObjectARX, and includes: A Windows interface that maps user input to the ObjectARX API A C++ wrapper that makes it possible to use the ObjectARX API from an application written in other programming languages An AutoLISP Language ObjectARX Interpreter, which translates AutoLISP statements into the ObjectARX API AutoLISP for Visual LISP AutoLISP for Visual LISP is a free application that allows users to create and manipulate objects, and draw objects.
